Subject contents	The starting point for the considerations undertaken during the classes is the assumption that the following should be considered crucial for the emergence of contemporary music as a cultural formation: 1. The year 1905 (Albert Einstein then formulates special theory of relativity), recognized by Marshall McLuhan as the time when the Gutenberg galaxy was finally replaced by the era of electricity and the culture of electronic media. Recognition of the fact that the impact of electricity on musical culture was significant, especially in the case of sound reproduction technologies, enabling, among others, the rise of electronic music. Its genesis is discussed in two thematic blocks titled: a) "From the serialism of the second Viennese school to the creation of the first musical work worthy of being called electronic." b) "From the art of noise by Italian futurists to the first piece of music worthy of being called electronic." 2. The turn of the 1960s and 1970s, treated as the beginning of the next phase of the electric era, in which a post-industrial society is established, giving up media systems assuming mass uniformity in favor of a culture of "individual adjustment". Its musical aspect is discussed in the thematic block devoted to the genesis, birth and development of "remix culture" (both in its analog and digital form). 3. The year 1976 - the beginning of a new era in the history of musical theater, marked by the premiere of the opera Einstein On The Beach by Philip Glass. Based on these three caesuras, the leader determines the topics of individual meetings. An additional block of course is devoted to contemporary musical anthropology.
