			They have a well-structured understanding of social communication and intercultural communication; they understand the role of the cultural context in professional practice; they are familiar with the basic mechanisms of intercultural and international communication; and they recognise the areas in which problems arise in linguistic and social communication. They are able to recognise processes and obstacles in intercultural communication, identify problems based on the 'us-them' dichotomy, and pinpoint the sources of problems in intercultural communication. They recognise and articulate moral issues and ethical dilemmas associated with a multicultural professional environment; they seek optimal solutions to intercultural conflicts and act in accordance with ethical principles.
